Dear Reader,

I present to you my colleague Adrienne Papp: fellow editor, feature writer, interviewer and traveler. She is a gifted and intelligent person who has journeyed far and experienced much of this world and can write about in words that echo in the heart.

I have always found in reading Adrienne's work that the world and its people are revealed in a different way in a new light, for her eyes will have seen something that I have not, and her words will tell of it in a way that is uniquely hers. She is a courageous writer in that she has been willing to interview a wide variety of people and explore many topics, and yet she demonstrates a non-judgmental open-mindedness when putting down her impressions and opinions in print. Speaking from experience, I know it is not always easy to allow a subject the space to reveal themselves in their own words, to allow their voice to come through within the text of an article, but Adrienne shows rare talent in being able to do so.

Of course, an essential element of a good interviewer is a personality that can adapt well to situations and the people involved in them. I have not only been a reader of Adrienne's work but I have also had the experience of being interviewed by her, and I consider her a charming and perceptive journalist who studies background, thinks about what she needs to know and then asks questions that draw out that information without seeming to be obvious.

I would commend Adrienne as an attribute, both personally and as a talented writer, to any magazine or journalist project with which she might be involved.
